Sentence Types

The number and types of clauses determine the structure of the sentence.

A simple sentence consists of one independent clause. Most dogs are loyal to their owners.
A compound sentence is made up of or more independent clauses. Most dogs are loyal to their owners, but cats are more independent. Most dogs are loyal to their owners; most cats are more independent.
Punctuating compound sentences Two independent clauses that are closely related can be joined with a semi-colon to form a compound sentence. We want to visit the coast this summer; our family loves swimming in the ocean and walking on the beach.
Use a comma before the coordinating conjunction (FANBOYS - for, and, nor, but, or, yet, so) that separates two independent clauses in a compound sentence. We want to vacation at the coast, for we love the sea.
A complex sentence is made up of independent clause and dependent clauses.
Although most dogs are loyal to their owners, cats are more independent. Note that introductory dependent clauses are followed by a comma they areclauses.
 Punctuating complex sentences Use commas to separate three or more words, phrases, or clauses. I understand that you dislike grammar, that you would rather be reading, and that you think this is unimportant. Use commas to set off an introductory adverb clause. After we finish lunch, we will begin painting the bedroom. Do not use a comma to set off adverb clauses in other positions. We are going to paint the bedroom after we finish eating lunch.
A compound-complex sentence is made up of or more independent clauses and or more dependent clauses. Cats and dogs have very different personalities; while dogs are loyal to their owners, most cats are more independent.
